They were unfurled there the other day when the American consulate-general took possession of one of the most pretentious homes in Cavandish Square, the most famous of English squares in the heart of London's fashionable west end. "I don't understand why they do not have grass greens in southern California. Los Angeles has as fine lawns in the residence section as any city in the country and yet the socalled "greens" at the golf courses are not green at all. They are merely circles of sand, as hard almost as asphalt pavement.

"It is impossible to pitch a shot to the green and stick. If you pitch and happen to strike on the green the ball bounds 20 feet into the air and far beyond the green. Players in Los Angeles and environs use the run-up shot exclusively. I understand they are experimenting to some extent now with grass, but none of them are being used, so far as I can ascertain."
